

Press release

Stockholm 01/04/03

New wire-less contact between patient and physician gives safer care

A handheld computer with a phone and special software gives chronically ill patients new care possibilities.

The computer can remind them when it's time for medication and collect registrations of symptoms, which are later sent to the physician.

– This gives the physician the possibility to adjust the medication of each patient in the most optimal way. It may also mean that patients don't have to visit their physician in order to discuss their medication, says Sophia Salenius, CEO of RegPoint.

Studies show that almost half of today's medication is ineffective. The reason is that many patients forget to take their medication, or that they take it but with the wrong dosage.

RegPoint is the name of the product making it possible to deal with the problem. The newly-started medical technology company, RegPoint, has developed the product in cooperation with Microsoft.

The base of the solution is that the physician puts information about ordination, symptoms, food and sleep, or other factors that might be of interest, into the handheld computer. Then it is the patient's task to follow the instructions and make registrations, which automatically is reported back to the physician, who can also configure alarms in the system in order to be notified in case the health condition of the patient is worsened.

– By the aid of RegPoint, the physician is able to keep track of the patient's well being at all times through his computer. This makes the patient not having to worry about side effects or whether the treatment is efficient or not, says Sophia Salenius.

Another field of application for RegPoint is to report about epidemics or attacks with chemical or biological weapons. Handheld computers, strategically set out in a group of the population based on geographical position or employer, can in an early stage create the opportunity to prevent the spreading of contagions and diseases.

RegPoint has already opened discussions with partners in the USA, Hong Kong, China and Singapore.

For further information, please contact

Sophia Salenius, CEO RegPoint

Phone: +46(0)733 92 22 40